Dean of Arts & Sciences, Ana Mari Cauce, receives the Minority Fellowship Program of the American Psychological Association’s James M. Jones Lifetime Achievement Award

The Minority Fellowship Program James Jones Lifetime Achievement Award is given in honor of its second Director who has served in that role for over 30 years. This prestigious award recognizes distinguished and exemplary long-term contributions to the field of racial and ethnic minority psychology from senior-level alum of the Minority Fellowship Program. The award is given only occasionally.

Cauce was nominated by a student and recognized for achievements in two categories:

1) research productivity, including empirical and theoretical contributions to knowledge that influence other scholars conducting research in the field; and

2) the development of other ethnic minority psychologists through teaching and training, including the development of exemplary courses or training models, mentoring, recruitment, or other forms of professional development of ethnic minority psychologists.
