Part 1: Scouting

Reimagining hiring as an ongoing activity rather than as a special occasion means encouraging your unit to be in the habit of regularly “scouting” for potential candidates who will enhance the faculty and its diversity profile in specific ways.

Scouting activities are meant to identify and build relationships with potential job candidates, so that the unit is in a good position to attract diverse pools of applicants for its approved searches. But scouting also can lead to the identification of “preferred” candidates the unit would like to hire immediately.

Active scouting thus raises a potentially controversial but important set of questions:

• Does the unit believe it is best to run relatively broad and fully open searches for every potential hire?

• Or does the unit believe it is good practice—and/or strategic necessity—to occasionally launch so-called target of opportunity hires that focus on one or more preferred candidates?

Thus, when thinking about scouting, units should consider several cautions:

• Scouting activities are meant to help build diverse pools of potential candidates for the future; they cannot guarantee funded positions.

• It is important to openly discuss how the unit and how the relevant college, school, or campus will approach preferred candidates and/or specialized searches in relation to long-range hiring plans.

• Unit leaders and college, school, or campus leaders should be careful not to build unrealistic expectations for either potential candidates or current faculty.

With these questions and cautions in mind, the unit is ready to foster effective habits for scouting:

• Develop, discuss, and regularly update long-range hiring plans, taking into consideration the unit’s current Affirmative Action Plan. (If the unit is unaware of its Affirmative Action Plan, check with the Office of Equal Opportunity and Affirmative Action). All members of the unit should be aware of current and anticipated needs, including those related to anticipated or known retirements, as well as of the unit’s “wish list” for future hires. Where does the unit hope to see itself in five or ten years?

- Encourage all members of the unit to view professional meetings as opportunities to scout for potential faculty candidates. Everyone should be encouraged to attend presentations by advanced graduate students and post-docs who will soon be on the job market, and by assistant professors who may be movable from current positions.

- Consider hosting a targeted reception or event at your discipline’s major conference or meeting. For example, an event might spotlight an established or emerging research area within your discipline that directly engages issues of diversity, inclusion, and equity, or it might spotlight opportunities for teaching, service, or outreach that directly engage issues of diversity, access, and equal opportunity.

- Consider using the unit’s lecture or seminar series as an opportunity to invite potential future candidates to campus. This is a “low stakes” way to introduce potential candidates to the unit and to campus allies, and to give them an opportunity to experience the UW firsthand.

A link to the Office of Equal Opportunity and Affirmative Action (EEOA) is available in the Toolkit.

Additional resources for developing long-range hiring plans are available in the Toolkit.